doubt to the material in which he works, Mr. Dwyer is reminiscent of Kipling, most of all in the stories which the German agent of Hagenwhich the Jerman agent of invite beck tells. It is hazardous to invite comparison with "Bimbi." Once or twice the mystery is of the Indian seas, as in "The Golden Woman of Kelantan"; it may be added that the auther is at his best when woman-the white woman—enters into the mystery of his tales, and with her intul-tion comes nearer to its heart, if only through her readier acceptance, than do her menfolk, as in "The Black Horsemen of Mir Jehal."

Several big themes-problems of the nation and its future are firmly in-tersoven in this tale of the great West and the Reclamation Service. There is the problem of the disappearance of am—the book is capital, full of the agnitude, the compelling demands of the agnitude, the compelling demands of the atask; and the awe-inspiring wild untry, with its growing grip upon one who live under its influence, is allingly reflected. The love motive wen through it all is strong the test adventure in adversity of a noble man and a man worthy of her. The an and a man worthy of her. The deserves attention and will pro-
